

I read the following and completely agree with it:

When a landline phone network suffers a serious outage, the company involved has to tell federal regulators what happened and how it can be avoided next time. The Federal Communications Commission believes the public outage reports, required since the early 1990s, have helped to dramatically improve network quality.

But the rule applies only to landline companies, an anachronistic loophole in this age of wireless phones and voice service from the cable company.

So it would make sense to expand the rule to other communications companies, right?

My answer to the above question is 'absolutely'. The Homeland Security Agency/Department and its rules would seriously hamper the ability of any other agency to make the best choices for the American people. I congratulate the FCC for taking this issue on and possibly following it to the logical conclusion of including cellular and internet services.

Thank you for your concerns and hard work.
